"See, I have brought an advance Christmas present for myself," said the collector, who stood in front of the office looking glass trying on a new beaver hat.

The young woman stenographer looked up coldly.

"Don't you like it?" asked the collector in an anxious tone.

"Yes, I like the hat. Also the man under it," said the young woman stenographer. But—

"Ah, those kind words of appreciation are—"

"A preface to some plain truths. What did you do with your old hat?"

"Ordered it sent here."

"Just as I thought. There is no use of my trying any longer. It is hopeless."

"Wait until I get a match and a cigar. There—go ahead. Tell me your trouble."

"Long ago," said the young woman stenographer, "the chief threw out a strong hint that I'd be a great comfort to him if I kept the vault in perfect order. He said it never had been done. That was my cue for working toward approval and incidentally an increase in salary."

The stenographer sighed. "Well, every time a salesman returns from a trip—whether he has been to New York or to Kansas City—he rushes out, buys a new hat and sends the old one here."

"The first hat I wrapped up carefully and put into the vault. The second I stuck into an old bandbox. The seventh and eighth I jumbled into a bag. For six months those packages were moved from one side of the vault to the other. Sometimes they were on the floor and sometimes on the shelf—always in the way. But I pictured to myself the gratitude those men would show when I brought out their hats the next season, scarcely used and as good as new."

The collector grinned. "Did they wear them?" he asked.

"No; still, they wouldn't let me throw those hats away. Finally I put Mr. Wolcott's hat on Mr. Barker's desk. Mr. Barker had no scruples about getting rid of it. A cast-off hat of Mr. Barker's I put on Mr. Hammond's chair—I didn't have to do it twice. This method I pursued systematically until there wasn't a superfluous hat left."

"You are a deep, designing woman."

The stenographer shook her head, and continued. "Just your mentioning Christmas makes me shudder. Last year, for weeks before Christmas, mysterious packages kept arriving and had to be stored in the vault. My real trouble, however, began after Christmas. What do people mean by giving such presents as they do? Look at the cushions on that settee. Regularly, I have to rip off the covers, take them to the cleaners, bring them back and sew them on again."

"What would you have the chief's friends give him?"

The stenographer scowled. "I wouldn't have them give him fancy calendars that have to be adjusted every morning."

"Hang a monthly calendar in his office and stop fussing."

"Is that a joke? Look at the walls in his office. Is there space on them for even a postcard? I had the photographs of at least thirty of those men framed for him and the clerk in the picture store acted just as if he thought I was making a collection of matinee idols. After the office was repapered the janitor and I hung pictures at the rate of one a minute."

"I noticed that you put the three ballet girls in the darkest corner and that you had the picture of the Johnson-Jeffries prize fight framed in black."

"Look at the chief's desk," said the young woman stenographer with a deepening sense of injustice. "That portfolio holds two sheets of paper and two one-cent stamps. The silver rim of that fancy blotter has to be mended weekly. No store in Chicago keeps the right-sized leads for those fancy pencils. I've tried 'em all. The only thing that lavender notebook holds is dust. Who gave him that fountain pen? Every time he uses it I feel as if I ought to put on a rain coat and stuff my ears with cotton."

"For eleven months a perfectly good shelf in the vault has been used for his misfit Christmas gifts. Yesterday he sent them to his country home and today when I looked at the perfect order of the vault I began to have hopes of more salary, but the chief went Christmas shopping today—and here's the boy with your hat!"

Interested.

"What did the rhinoceros do when you fired at him?" asked the eager listener.

"He just stood still and watched me run."
